The cost of ad hoc mail is overlooked in most organizations. Simple steps can lead to considerable savings through consolidation, automation and postal discounts.

Are you passing over business opportunities?

Since there are less and less large companies that outsource a high volume of printing and since you can't get more business out of your existing customers, you're faced with always looking for new ones. The reality is that print is expected to decline as a percentage of overall communications spend in 2017.¹ You need to onboard more and more customers to maintain or increase your print volume, but more customers means more processing, and smaller print jobs are not less complex than big ones and they require the same processing time. This means your overhead is increasing while profitability is impacted. You might even be passing over business opportunities because you can't make a profit off of their volume.

Are you missing deadlines?

Print orders come to you on different types of media each time: ftp, USB flash drive, CD-ROM, Web, etc. Each one requires many small steps that amount to a lot of wasted time: confirming receipt, sending a price confirmation, searching for the source, moving and renaming source files, configuring the print job and informing the customer of the mailing date. And you have to restart these tedious tasks for each order, big and small alike!

Do you struggle to provide better customer service?

Continually having to look for new customers and manage their ad hoc orders keeps you busy, so it's hard to find the time to improve your processes and provide a better customer service. The customer experience is key to earning customer loyalty. People are increasingly accustomed to using interactive online services. Not being able to provide such services penalizes you in terms of keeping up with the competition.

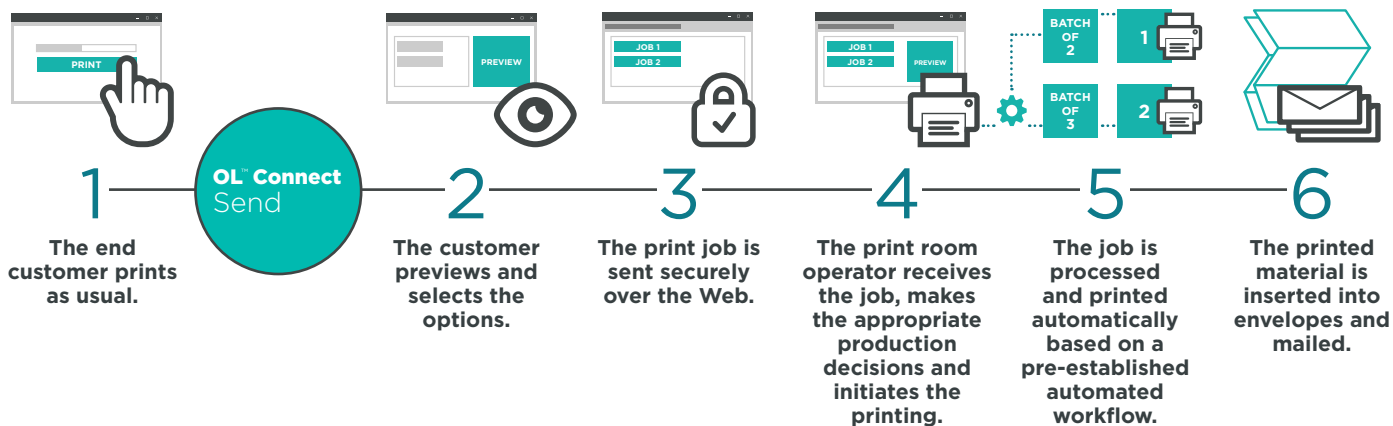

“55% of PSPs cited their ability to increase sales as their biggest concern.”
